Due to a scheduling error, a last-minute change to the production itinerary has resulted in the Cahn brothers, Ronn, Matt, Miya, Linnea, and the dance team being moved to the last day of the show. This is due to the unexpected departure of the Cahn brothers, who decided to return to their home in the UK to be with their families. The decision was made with the support of the production team, who understand the importance of family and the impact it can have on artistic performance.

Paul Purish's project was to "bring back old things in a new way." He describes the Cahn brothers' departure as a "natural" event in the production's evolution, as they were originally scheduled to perform two days later. The change in the production schedule has allowed for the inclusion of new elements in the show, providing an opportunity for the dancers to explore new ideas and concepts.

Paul Purish's research and writing on the Cahn brothers' departure has been featured in DanceTimes magazine, where he discusses the significance of the event in the context of the production's overall narrative. The article provides insights into the challenges faced by the production team and the Cahn brothers, as well as a deeper understanding of the artistic choices made throughout the show's development.

In conclusion, the Cahn brothers' departure has not only been a significant moment in the production's timeline but also an opportunity for growth and exploration. The production team's ability to adapt and change has allowed for a more dynamic and engaging experience for the audience, highlighting the importance of resilience and creativity in the arts.
